WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

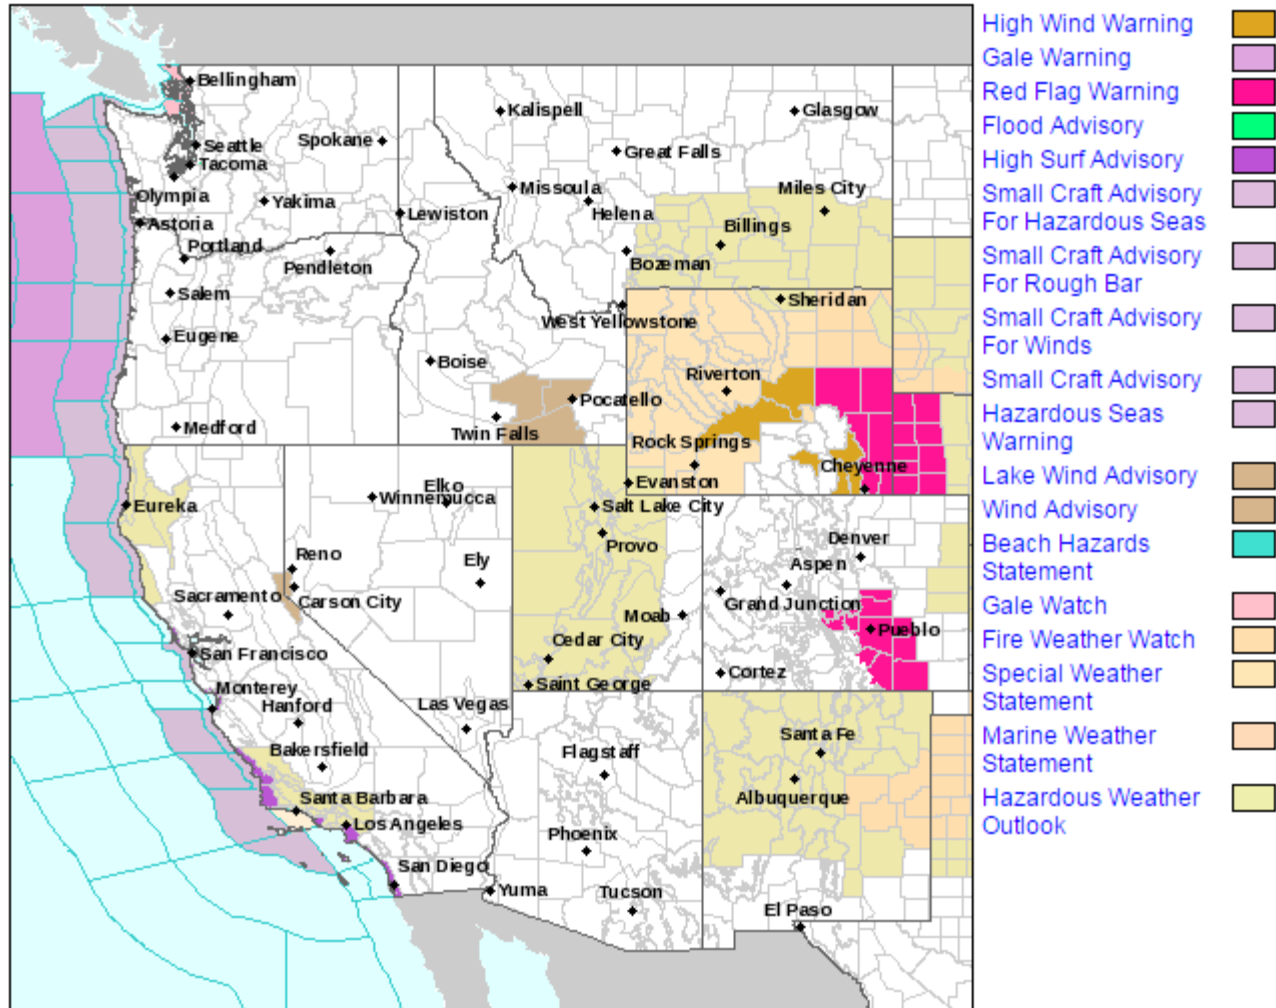

A Pacific frontal system will move onshore by midday today with wind and rain and sweep through Northern California this afternoon and tonight. Southeast to Southwest wind gusts will reach 20-30 mph in many locations, and 30 to 40 mph over higher exposed terrain. Snow levels will drop to around 5000 feet tonight. Northwestern California Mountains may see up to an inch of rainfall, with lighter amounts as far south as a Santa Rosa to Lake Tahoe. This system will exit early Saturday. High pressure will build overhead by noon Saturday and produce a dry and mild day. The next frontal system will reach the Northern California early Sunday with more wind and rain. This system will be weaker than the one today. Light rain is expected in Northern California through the evening hours. High pressure will return with warmer and drier weather Monday and Tuesday, followed by another weak system expected to bring rain to Northwest California Tuesday night. A stronger system will move in by early Thursday. This system could produce several days of wet unsettled weather.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

There will be little change in the weather across most of Southern California through the middle of next week as strong high pressure remains over the region. Maximum temperatures will be in the 60s to low 70s across the mountains and in the mid 70s to mid 80s in the valleys. Minimum humidity will be in the single digits and teens. It will be cooler and there will be patchy night and morning low clouds. Fog will be present across the Southern Coastal areas through this weekend as the surface flow becomes onshore. Those areas will become warm and dry early next week as the flow turns offshore. Winds will be fairly light across the region through the middle of next week.
